

THE SARTORIALIST STRIKES: Runway photographers weren't the only ones taking the shots this season. Anyone exiting a show, waiting around for one or even tooling around town in a snazzy ensemble may well have been photographed by Scott Schuman, better known as "The Sartorialist." The New York blogger, a cult favorite among fashion fans around the world for his on-the-street snapping prowess, was in town to capture Milanese street style for Men.style.com. "They say be careful what you ask for," Schuman said outside the Miu Miu show. "In New York I'm running around town trying to find people to shoot. Here my finger would fall off if I shot every girl and guy that looks good. This has just been a dream." Men.style.com liked his work so much that they asked the affable artist to continue on for Paris Fashion Week. The blue-eyed Schuman's stock is definitely on the rise: He's said to be in talks with Esquire for an upcoming project, and a Saks Fifth Avenue window display slated for Aug. 15 will showcase his work on one side and an homage to veteran New York Times photographer Bill Cunningham on the other.

